

Wittgenstein: Mind and Language

The essays collected in this volume represent, in a revised version, the papers of the Wittgenstein Conference held in November 1989 at the University of Rome 'La Sapienza' to celebrate the centenary of his birth. They offer a systematic account of Wittgenstein's philosophy of mind and contribute to illuminate his later conception of perceptive, emotional and cognitive language. Some of the reasons why it seemed the right time to promote an ample confrontation of ideas on Wittgenstein's mature perspective are sufficiently clear as they derive from the need to sum up the state of research based on the availability of the Nachlaß and the publication in the last decade of a conspicuous quantity of writings dedicated to philosophical psychology; other reasons are more complex as they depend on the already noticed tendency in the recent epistemological debate to interpret Wittgenstein's provocative and controversial theses in a "perverse" way, in a way which has been used as a banner for epistemic relativism, subjectivism, and irrationalism. The intention of this collection of essays is to construct an image of Wittgenstein's thought, which is as faithful as possible to his philosophy of mind and language from both a theoretical and exegetical point of view. The book also strives to assess the continuity and internal coherence of the theses developed throughout the different phases of his research.
