

Exploring Intersectionality in Schools

Voices on Race and SEND for Advocacy and Change

This accessible and informative guide explores the intersection of race, disability, neurodivergence, and education, emphasising the importance of taking an intersectional approach to address the unique challenges faced by marginalised and minoritised students. The chapters feature rich, honest conversations with advocates in education who generously share their professional and lived experiences. These stories were not easy to tell, they are deeply personal and often challenging to hear, but they are shared with courage and openness to drive meaningful change. In amplifying these voices, the book delves into a wide range of pertinent topics from bias and stereotyping to misdiagnosis, mental health, and safeguarding, offering a holistic understanding of intersectionality. Throughout, the book provides actionable strategies and real world examples of successful practices, with guidance included to create supportive learning environments, ensure valuable ongoing teacher development, and collaborate with families and communities. Exploring Intersectionality in Schools encourages advocacy and inspires change, offering thoughtful insights and concrete tools to transform educational practices and policies. It is essential reading for all educators, policymakers, advocates, parents, and carers.
